Fire broke out in the house in Carrollton occupied by French Gibson Monday morning. The members of the family thought they had put out the blaze and

There is a big gang of tramps that is making their headquarters of the stock pens at the Santa Fe. There is a lawsuit on in Bloomington against Albert Claybrook. Claybrook alleges that it is because he sold ice cream and soda pop. The Evangelical church claims to have had its meetings disturbed by Claybrook's throwing rocks against their church building several different nights last October. Claybrook claims that "certain parties" had threatened to burn his store and that is why one of the deacons of the church found him on guard with a shotgun where he ran across the street to find out who was bombarding the church. Nearly all the village is subpoenaed as witnesses. Bloomington is a village that never indulges in shows or other secular amusements. The town is devoted to her churches. In days gone by Bloomington was the county seat, the relay station of live stage lines and not at all squeamish. Claybrook would have been in danger of his life then for selling ice cream or soda pop—because iron stomachs would have been insulted at such thin gruel.
